MOBILE-ELECTRONICS NEW PRODUCTS

Redefining the Future of Mobile Technology

Advanced driver assistance systems (ADAS), including radar blind-spot detection, backup cameras, driver connectivity and collision and lane-departure avoidance systems, continue to gain momentum in the $1.5 billion mobile-electronics industry. These technologies are not only being offered in new vehicles; aftermarket manufacturers have also adapted products to fit many older vehicles that are already on the road. The opportunities in this market are growing. Mobile-electronics products covered a swath of real estate in the North Hall of the Las Vegas Convention Center during the 2018 SEMA Show. The following is a collection of products that were on display in the New Products Showcase last year, along with insight by industry experts.

"We're starting to see more traction in retrofit safety products, such as radar blind-spot detection. The most excitement right now is around our new radar blind-spot system for the F-150, which like all pickups, has huge blind spots but very little technology penetration across trim levels from the OEMs. For the longest time, the backup camera was the main safety product shops would sell and we would offer, but now there seems to be much greater interest in all retrofit safety solutions. Solutions such as blind-spot detection, collision avoidance and lane-departure systems are gaining ground."

"The mobile-electronics market, from our perspective, is both narrowing focus while also expanding exponentially. Most new vehicles come with an array of technological gadgets and connectivity, but we're also living in a time when there are more older vehicles still on the road than ever before. Manufacturers of mobile-electronics items are adapting to fit older vehicles with easier installs and more user-friendly controls. The possibilities for modification and personalization of a vehicle are endless."

"This is an exciting time for us at US Shift, as the last decade has provided revolutionary advancements in automatic transmission technology. Modern six-, eight-, and 10-speed transmissions increase performance, efficiency and reliability in today's vehicles. Due to the complexity of controlling newer transmissions, they have previously been difficult to retrofit to non-OEM applications. Thanks to our patented self-tuning clutch-to-clutch technology, modern transmissions can now deliver unprecedented performance and fuel economy to earlier vehicles and custom applications. We are working hard to expand our line of clutch-to-clutch transmission controllers, such as the Quick 6, while building on our success with popular four-speed controllers, such as the Quick 4. We are grateful to be a part of so many interesting vehicle builds that might not have otherwise been possible."

"The mobile electronics industry continues to evolve in several directions as advanced vehicle technologies—particularly, advanced driver assistance systems (ADAS)—disrupt traditional products and market segments. Due to increasing performance of automakers' in-car entertainment and infotainment systems, combined with the complexity of replacing factory-installed equipment in newer vehicles, the mobile-electronics aftermarket has been mostly focused on older vehicles and enthusiasts. While some traditional product segments have declined, new segments focused on Android and Apple mobile phone connectivity, as well as aftermarket passive ADAS safety features, such as rear backup cameras, forward collision warning and lane-departure warning, have created new business and product-development opportunities for mobile-electronics manufacturers and retailers. These new technologies have opened up a $1.5 billion market for the aftermarket mobile electronics industry and are detailed in the SEMA Advanced Vehicle Technology Report and ADAS Resource Guide at www.semagarage.com/services/vehicleadas."

"For VOXX Electronics and our dealers and consumers, the future of the mobile-electronics business is bright. VOXX continues to invest in R&D to develop new products and features that enhance the in-vehicle security, convenience, comfort and entertainment experience for consumers—this also gives our dealers and professional installers more products to sell and install. The aftermarket has been and will always be the incubator of new in-vehicle technologies. There are also a lot of people that will tell you OEMs are adding more and more to vehicles, taking away aftermarket opportunities. While it is true, OEMs continue to adopt these technologies into new vehicles, while also bringing more awareness to the category. This results in more consumers wanting these new and exciting features added to the cars they already own without them. We've seen and heard this for years about remote-start systems, and the aftermarket category remains healthy because companies like VOXX continue to innovate and bring new features to market. We now see this happening with the collision avoidance (ADAS) category. While OEMs are adopting ADAS features to new vehicles, consumers are becoming more knowledgeable and aware they can add them to their other vehicles. For the aftermarket, manufacturers must continue to develop and bring new, innovative products to market, while retailers and expeditors continue to promote and professionally install them. I've been in the aftermarket mobile electronics industry for more than 35 years, and this is still a very exciting time for aftermarket mobile electronics!"
